On our walk this morning, the sky was eight oktas full of gray stratus clouds and looked like someone had spilled gray paint across the sky. It really wasn't blowing that hard, only 4.5 mph from the North North West. The air pressure was 30.03 inHg, the humidity was 37% and the temperatures were 52.5°F and 11.4°C. It was not a particularly nice day, but then again, it wasn't raining, so I suppose we can be grateful for that.

This morning we saw what might have been a kestrel flying very low to the ground, some red-chested robins and sparrows. We also saw two mockingbirds sitting in a tree. One might have been male and the other might have been female, but it is hard to tell with mockingbirds.
