

Jack's Nature Journal
12-10-08

It was really, really soggy this morning. Bleah! The rain was pouring down fast and hard, the sky was 8 oktas full of stratus clouds, and little streams were forming by the side of the road. We bundled up as well as we could, with ski pants, thick jackets and raincoats, but the rain still found its way in! Anyway, the wind this morning was coming from the NW at 3.5 mph, but it was definitely going faster than that on the walk. We were nearly blown away at one point! The temperatures were 56°F and 14°C, although I didn't get too close to the thermometer as the floor on the deck was wet around it, so I might be a little off. The air pressure was 30.15 inHg and the humidity was 58%. We saw and heard some crows, and that's about it!