

How many sayings or expressions can you come up with that show how our use of language still reflects an earlier view that our feelings relate to our hearts and not our brains?

From the heart, heartfelt apology, close to my heart, after one's own heart, at heart, eat one's heart out, heart in mouth, a heart of gold, young at heart and many more.

Do you think there is a soul separate from the the brain? How would the soul be related to a biological structure such as the brain?

As a Christian, I believe that there is a soul that goes to an afterlife after your material body is dead. However, I don't know how much of our thinking processes are controlled by our soul, or our mind if you prefer, and how much is controlled by chemicals (I get grumpy if I don't eat enough). I don't know how the soul fits into the brain, and that really is one that I'll leave to the philosophers because we can never know that for sure.
