

Hall of Human Origins

If you want to learn some cool stuff, go to the Hall of Human Origins in the American Museum of Natural History. Here you will find out all you could ever want to know about our ancestors. From seeing people make a model of what a Neanderthal might have looked like to learning about how some animals use tools, there's no shortage of inspiration for the aspiring biologist (and people who just popped in because they thought it might be cool)!

My favorite part of the exhibit was a part about instruments, where it talked about humans using instruments to express themselves. You also got to make your own song!
